Mortality Among Calves.

Attention has been lately directed to the losses which many breeders and dairymen sustain through the death of calves. The cows appear to calve down properly, and the calves live for a short time, but they invariably drop and die. The cause of this is a very considerable loss for several years, come to the conclusion that the trouble resulted from giving the cows a great deal of chaff, with too much discolored and husked cake. When he fed his calf in that way, having sold his calf, he found that nearly every calf went off in sour when about three or four days old, and he therefore came to the conclusion that it would be well to try a change of diet. He consequently, when the cows were coming upon calving time, fed them a little less chaff and a little more hay, and with the addition of a little buttermilk, oat meal, or bran.

Since he made this change in the diet of the calves, the mortality among them has been greatly reduced. There is an other way in which this probably can be counted for. In the first place, it is well known that where there has been an outbreak of infectious abortion, the calves are born dead or die within a few days, and it may be that this would be a reasonable explanation of the fatalities. Constipation also might be the cause of death, and it would be less likely to attract attention than when the calves showed signs of scour. There is a great similarity of opinion as to the cause of feeding cows just before and after calving, and too little attention is paid to their treatment and diet. Any farmer or cow keeper who have met with losses in this way, might find it advisable to take the hint which is given above from actual experience, and try it with advantage, subsequently to their following workers the advantage of the knowledge they may obtain by experiment, or of which they may happen to have come into possession, if they have encountered and surmounted the trouble.

An Expert on Finishing Butter.

As for salt, use the best, it is never too good. Use a fine granulated, clean and easy dissolving salt. Coarse salt is all right for the purpose of dissolving and precipitating the two workings, which in large quantities, and in the warm season, I think best to avoid. In putting on the salt, use a hair sieve, thereby avoiding lumps and uneven settling, and the streaked and mottled butter caused by improper salting. In testing salt, measure off equal quantities to an equal amount of water, and the salt most quickly dissolved and giving the clearest butter is the salt you want. Use salt to suit your market and the season, and when varying from, to be perfect in your butter. In working, whether washing the butter or not, be careful to use the moisture well off before salting; this will save salt, save the grain and make a better body. However, if the three aspects of salting, working and packing, I believe the best is the one most seriously neglected or overlooked, and which subjects as much from the price of the product as the two former put together.

Always get the best tub which money will buy.

Look to it that it is well made, and which will give you the best butter in the market, in short, a tub of uniform make—uniformity is the great watchword in the creamery business; uniformity of cream, uniformity of make, uniformity of packing, uniformity in salting the tub, and uniformity in marking. In salting the tubs use care not to wash them all over the outside, nor is it in any common necessary to keep water in them as long as is usually the custom. Four or five hours is sufficient. When packing the tub, get all the butter in it will hold; cut the butter off even with the edge, and never smooth it with a knife, put on the cloth and cork each tub as it is filled, nail up with three or four tins universal fasteners and never use any other fastener. Remove the tub to the cold storage as soon as possible. In the whole process of salting, working and packing, conduct the operations with a view of exposing the butter the least possible and hide it away out of danger, or quicker the better.—K.

Crop Rotation.

I have been very successful with a four crops rotation and my land has steadily improved. I sowed corn in the fall, good over crop and a heavy supply of good manure as anything else. I sowed about acres of clover every spring and make much hay as I think is profitable or a local market will take. The remaining acres on the land I sowed clover and I have cut out for seed if well liked. That is known to be good for pasture. I sowed 25 to 30 acres of corn for fodder, and this with the straw from 65 acres of clover is put through the stables and mangled from the time I first began to feed, as fast as the cattle can eat it, and I saturate it. I don't part with any straw until after feeding is over in the spring. I keep nine head of milch cows, one bull, several heifers, 20 sheep and eight horses. These are stable nights and cold weather, but the rest of the time are turned into the yard. Stables are thoroughly cleaned every day and heavily bedded with straw. The manure is spread over the yard and all that will do is used for topdressing as soon as it is well rotted. The manure is then and the remainder goes on soil, to play under the corn. I allow no weeds to seed in the fields I can help it. I clip off stubble fields in August, clover included, if it is high enough, and it usually is. I use an old binder for this purpose. I have had 150 farm over 15 years and have raised crops every year and at the same time I have increased the fertility of the land without the aid of commercial fertilizers, and I find that farming pays when right is practiced.—K. in Rural New Yorker.

"Hev" shouted the policeman, as the order whizzed by him, "Why, when I proposed to her, instead of saying 'I'm so sudden,' she said, 'well, I think it's about time.'"

"Don't know," howled the scotchman over his shoulder, "I haven't ridden an hour yet."—Cincinnati Tribune.

"My wife is a most original woman," said Brown. "Why, when I proposed to her, instead of saying 'I'm so sudden,' she said, 'well, I think it's about time.'"

"I saw a man to-day who had no land left. He said, 'I've got a girl down on our flat has no voice and who sings!'—Yonkers Statesman.
